1. Find support

When social situations make you anxious, it can be challenging to get out and do things that make you happy. The first thing to do for dealing with social anxiety is to seek support. One of the easiest ways of regularly doing this is to take a trusted friend or family member with you when you go out. If they are comfortable doing so, your companion can help you to navigate social interactions like ordering food and meeting new people. It's also a good idea to seek professional support in time if you feel you need to. Going without this professional support may not be beneficial to you or your loved ones in the long term. However, help from friends and family is often more accessible.

2. Move slowly

Like any problem, dealing with social anxiety isn't an overnight fix. You may also find that certain situations make your anxiety better or worse. Moving slowly by taking small steps towards your goal will help when it comes to putting yourself in new or unfamiliar situations. Conversely, trying to progress too quickly can ultimately result in exhaustion, falling backwards and aggravating your feelings of social anxiety.

3. Be kind to yourself

Accept that your anxiety may be worse in different situations. Recognising this and being okay with it is the best way to avoid beating yourself up when you're unable to deal with your anxiety. In the long run, understanding your mental health and progress will help you avoid setbacks and worsening your anxiety.

4. Bring along home comforts

Similar to a trusted friend or family member, a comfort item is a great way to stay calm in social situations. Anxiety tricks your brain into thinking that you're in a dangerous or uncomfortable position when you aren't, so having an item that you associate with being safe and comfortable helps to combat these worries.
